

Desperate Desmond

A Drum Is Made to Be Beaten, but the Villain Isn't Built That Way

By Hershfield

Copyright, 1931, National News Ass'n.

Claude Eclair, hero, and his beautiful Rosamond are overjoyed to see the villain Desmond securely in the hands of the leaders of the revolutionary party. As Desmond is known to be a Manchurian sympathizer, Claude knows that the second he will receive no easy treatment from the opposing party. At last there is a chance to escape from China and get back to peaceful happiness in America.

The leaders of the revolutionary party have hit upon a plan that will not only punish Desmond severely, but will at the same time prove of some benefit to the party. The villain is compelled to pack the heavy drum all along the route of the parade, while the sturdy drum player lets an occasional wallop fall upon Desmond instead of the drumhead. This was one of the party from a disagreeable task and is punishment enough.

As Desmond toils along with the drum he does not allow his attention to be taken off some chance for escape, even when the drum stick descends upon the side of his head. He cannot look around much, owing to the cramped position he occupies under the weight of the drum, but his observant eye spots a manhole in the street and he is quick to slip into it. The astonished drummer goes tumbling over head first and Desmond laughs a cruel laugh.

The discomfiture of the drummer, while pleasing to Desmond, is far from enough to satisfy him. So, reaching up from the manhole, he seizes the drum and prepares to hurl it back down the line of march. Knowing its weight from his recent bitter experience, the villain calculates that as the heavy drum rolls along it will knock over Claude and his friends of the revolutionary party before they have time to escape from the path of this musical avalanche.

Claude and Rosamond, walking happily along among their Chinese friends of the party of progress, are suddenly knocked over by the drum, which is gaining speed at every roll. Over, too, go the Chinese run into by this apparently crazy drum, which bounds from one form to another in its mad career. The villain's hastily formed plan has proved strangely successful, and the recently gorgeous parade is now a line of prostrate figures.

"I'm the boy!" cries Desperate Desmond. "Can't you Chink can fool me?" The wily, occasional villain has fooled the Orientals, and in the confusion has managed to capture Rosamond and is now rushing away with the girl in his power, while the paraders try to extricate themselves from the mass. Claude is sorry now that he mixed with the paraders and wishes that he had left politics alone while in China anyway. Tomorrow we shall see Desmond's next villainy.
